MANAGER COMMENTARY
Market Overview

Reversing the trend of the prior two quarters, larger capitalization equities led the market higher in Q2 2021 with the S&P 500 and Russell 2000 Value rising 8.5% and 4.6%, respectively. Growth stocks also resumed their leadership over value during the quarter. The leadership shift to larger cap equities with growth characteristics is consistent with the modest decline in Treasury yields and flattening yield curve experienced during the quarter. The key question for markets is does the shift in equity market leadership and the flattening yield curve signal a regime change in economic growth and inflation expectations?

As we mentioned in our prior quarterly communications, our longest leading indicators were starting to signal a potential slowdown in economic growth. During the most recent quarter, the long and short-term leading indicators have confirmed a downturn in the growth rate. This downturn in the industrial cycle is underway globally, with China and the U.S. leading the slowdown in industrial activity. Our current expectation is for economic growth to decline from the current unsustainably high levels and begin to moderate into the second half of the year. As industrial activity slows, the services side of the economy should remain healthy as the economy fully reopens, employment growth accelerates, and consumers continue to reduce their excess savings rate. Should the economic slowdown become too pronounced, the growth in the services economy may also slow, but this is a risk equity markets would not likely begin to discount until late 2021 to early 2022.

Despite the industrial growth slowdown, self-reinforcing inflationary pressures continue to build globally led by labor costs, housing prices, and energy prices. Inflationary pressures may prove transitory over the medium term, but the stickiness of these short-term pressures may limit the Federal Reserve's ability to respond should the economic slowdown prove excessive, or equity markets come under downside pressure. Recent downside volatility in the most speculative assets is consistent with peaking liquidity conditions. Given the Federal Reserve's excessive quantitative easing in the last decade, market prices are reliant on continued increases in quantitative easing, and if inflationary pressures prevent the Federal Reserve from expanding quantitative easing as needed, further equity market volatility should be expected.

Portfolio Positioning

As a result of buys and sells and market action, the portfolio is overweight Information Technology, Communication Services, Materials, Energy, and Utilities while underweight Healthcare, Consumer Staples, Industrials, Real Estate, Financials, and Consumer Discretionary.

Contributors to Performance

During the quarter, the portfolio experienced positive absolute and positive relative performance. Positive contributions from Healthcare, Communication Services, Consumer Discretionary, Materials, Utilities, and Consumer Staples were offset by negative contribution from Industrials, Information Technology, Financials, Real Estate, and Energy.
